

Onboarding and Offboarding Handbook

BluePeak Technologies | Payroll policy corpus

This document is fictional and was created only as a training dataset for a student Employee FAQ Chatbot. It is not legal, HR, tax, medical, or employment advice.

Document ID	BPT-HR-ONB-012	Version	v1.0
Effective date	2026-01-01	Next review date
Owner	People Operations	Classification	Internal Training Data
Source URL	https://intranet.bluepeak.example/hr/onboarding	Policy category	Payroll

Purpose

This handbook organizes the employee lifecycle steps that occur before the first day, during onboarding, during an unpaid leave of absence, and at resignation or separation.

For purpose, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of purpose should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This purpose provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for purpose, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this purpose section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Before Your First Day

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for before your first day. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

The employee should complete the pre-start information requested by People Operations so day-one verification and access can proceed.

Managers and process owners should apply the before your first day language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For before your first day, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of before your first day should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This before your first day provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for before your first day, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

Day One Checklist

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for day one checklist. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

I-9 verification must be completed within three business days of the start date. The employee receives the information needed to begin the benefits-enrollment window and company access setup.

The examples and explanatory wording in this day one checklist section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the day one checklist language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For day one checklist, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of day one checklist should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This day one checklist provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

First Week

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for first week. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

The first week is used to complete onboarding activities and confirm that required access and employee records are available. Security access remains subject to BPT-IT-SEC-011.

Employees should provide accurate information for first week, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this first week section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the first week language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For first week, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of first week should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

Benefits Enrollment Window

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for benefits enrollment window. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

The benefits enrollment window is 30 days from the employee's start date. The detailed enrollment rules are in BPT-HR-BEN-007.

This benefits enrollment window provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for benefits enrollment window, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this benefits enrollment window section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the benefits enrollment window language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For benefits enrollment window, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Probationary Review

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for probationary review. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

A probationary review occurs at 90 days.

Administration of probationary review should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This probationary review provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for probationary review, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this probationary review section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the probationary review language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

Requesting an Unpaid Leave of Absence

This section describes the required administrative path for requesting an unpaid leave of absence. A request is evaluated under the stated eligibility, notice, documentation, and approval rules; submitting information does not by itself change a limit or create approval.

An unpaid leave of absence is available for up to 12 weeks with People Operations approval. Benefits continue during the unpaid leave, and the employee pays the full premium.

For requesting an unpaid leave of absence, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of requesting an unpaid leave of absence should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This requesting an unpaid leave of absence provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for requesting an unpaid leave of absence, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this requesting an unpaid leave of absence section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Resignation and Notice

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for resignation and notice. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

The standard resignation notice is two weeks. People managers are requested to provide four weeks of notice.

Managers and process owners should apply the resignation and notice language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For resignation and notice, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of resignation and notice should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This resignation and notice provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for resignation and notice, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

Equipment Return

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for equipment return. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

Company equipment must be returned within 30 days of the last working day. The return obligation should be coordinated with the security access requirements in BPT-IT-SEC-011.

The examples and explanatory wording in this equipment return section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the equipment return language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For equipment return, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of equipment return should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This equipment return provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Exit Interview

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for exit interview. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

An exit interview is offered but is not required.

Employees should provide accurate information for exit interview, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this exit interview section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the exit interview language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For exit interview, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Final Pay

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for final pay. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

Final pay is handled under BPT-FIN-PAY-009 section 7. That guide states the timing for final pay and the PTO policy states the treatment of accrued unused PTO.

This final pay provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for final pay, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this final pay section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the final pay language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.