1. Purpose

This policy provides a defined paid leave category for an employee who cannot work because of illness or a medical absence. It also establishes notification, documentation, extended-absence, return-to-work, and confidentiality rules.

For purpose, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Employees should provide accurate information for purpose, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

2. Scope and Eligibility

This section identifies who the Sick Leave and Medical Absence Policy applies to and which employment or coverage conditions control. Eligibility must be determined from this document rather than inferred from a similarly named benefit, leave type, reimbursement program, or site practice.

Full-time employees receive 10 paid sick days per calendar year. Sick leave is available from the first day of employment and has no waiting period.

Managers and process owners should apply the scope and eligibility language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

This scope and eligibility provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

3. Annual Allowance and Accrual

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for annual allowance and accrual. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

The full-time allowance is 10 paid sick days per calendar year. Sick leave accrues at 0.83 days for each completed month. Sick leave does not carry over, and any unused balance expires on December 31.

The examples and explanatory wording in this annual allowance and accrual section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Administration of annual allowance and accrual should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

4. Requesting Medical Leave

This section describes the required administrative path for requesting medical leave. A request is evaluated under the stated eligibility, notice, documentation, and approval rules; submitting information does not by itself change a limit or create approval.

The employee should notify the manager before the start of the scheduled shift where possible. The procedural reporting route is Form HR-102 Absence Report described in the Employee Support and HR Requests Guide (BPT-HR-GUIDE-006).

Employees should provide accurate information for requesting medical leave, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

5. Medical Documentation

This section explains how information related to medical documentation is documented, retained, or protected. Records should be limited to the information needed to administer the written rule and should be handled by the responsible BluePeak function.

Medical documentation may be requested after three consecutive scheduled workdays of absence. Documentation is provided to People Operations rather than to the employee's manager.

This medical documentation provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Managers and process owners should apply the medical documentation language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

6. Extended and Intermittent Absence

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for extended and intermittent absence. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

An absence beyond 10 consecutive workdays is handled as extended medical leave and requires People Operations review. Intermittent medical absence is permitted in half-day increments when supported by documentation.

Administration of extended and intermittent absence should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

The examples and explanatory wording in this extended and intermittent absence section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

1. Documentation requirements are waived where prohibited by local law, including for Dublin-based employees.

7. Return to Work

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for return to work. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

Return-to-work clearance is required after an absence of 15 or more consecutive calendar days. The clearance is handled by People Operations so that medical information remains separate from routine manager records.

For return to work, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Employees should provide accurate information for return to work, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

8. Interaction with Other Leave Types

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for interaction with other leave types. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

An illness should be recorded under this policy rather than as paid time off when Sick Leave applies. For non-birth and adoptive parent leave, see Section 5 of the Family and Parental Leave Policy (BPT-HR-LEAVE-003).

Managers and process owners should apply the interaction with other leave types language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

This interaction with other leave types provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

9. Confidentiality

This section explains how information related to confidentiality is documented, retained, or protected. Records should be limited to the information needed to administer the written rule and should be handled by the responsible BluePeak function.

Medical information is held by People Operations only and is not shared with managers. Managers receive only the administrative information needed to plan work and confirm the employee's status.

The examples and explanatory wording in this confidentiality section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Administration of confidentiality should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text.
