1. Purpose

This guide explains BluePeak pay dates, pay components, expense-reimbursement payment, overtime and premium pay, deductions, final pay, corrections, and the reference schedules in the appendices.

For purpose, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of purpose should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This purpose provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for purpose, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this purpose section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the purpose language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

2. Pay Schedule

This reference section organizes the operational details associated with pay schedule. The table or glossary should be read with the related body section because a row does not replace the surrounding eligibility, approval, or exception language.

Employees are paid semi-monthly on the 15th and the last business day of the month. When a scheduled pay date falls on a weekend or holiday, payment moves to the prior business day.

Managers and process owners should apply the pay schedule language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For pay schedule, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of pay schedule should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This pay schedule provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for pay schedule, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this pay schedule section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

3. Pay Components

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for pay components. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

A paycheck may include base pay and any overtime, weekend, holiday, reimbursement, or deduction item that applies under this guide. Each component should be identified separately so that a correction can be traced to the affected pay date.

The examples and explanatory wording in this pay components section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the pay components language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For pay components, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of pay components should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This pay components provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for pay components, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

4. Expense Reimbursement Payment

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for expense reimbursement payment. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

An approved expense reimbursement is paid in the next payroll cycle after approval. The underlying claim remains subject to the Travel and Expense Reimbursement Policy (BPT-FIN-EXP-004).

Employees should provide accurate information for expense reimbursement payment, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this expense reimbursement payment section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the expense reimbursement payment language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For expense reimbursement payment, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of expense reimbursement payment should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This expense reimbursement payment provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

5. Overtime and Premium Pay

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for overtime and premium pay. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

A non-exempt employee receives overtime at 1.5x for hours over 40 in a workweek. A non-exempt employee receives a 2x premium for weekend and holiday work.

This overtime and premium pay provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for overtime and premium pay, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this overtime and premium pay section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the overtime and premium pay language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For overtime and premium pay, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of overtime and premium pay should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

6. Deductions

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for deductions. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

Payroll shows required and authorized deductions as separate pay components. Employee benefit contributions continue to be deducted during paid parental leave under BPT-HR-LEAVE-003.

Administration of deductions should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This deductions provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for deductions, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this deductions section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the deductions language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For deductions, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

7. Separation and Final Pay

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for separation and final pay. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

Final pay is issued within five business days of separation or sooner when state law requires. Accrued unused PTO is paid under BPT-HR-PTO-001 section 7.

For separation and final pay, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of separation and final pay should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This separation and final pay provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for separation and final pay, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this separation and final pay section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the separation and final pay language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

8. Payroll Corrections

This section sets out the BluePeak rule for payroll corrections. It should be applied with the document metadata, the related sections in this policy, and any stated cross-reference so that a number or phrase is not taken out of context.

A payroll correction must be requested within 60 days of the affected pay date. The request should identify the pay date and the component believed to be incorrect.

Managers and process owners should apply the payroll corrections language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For payroll corrections, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of payroll corrections should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This payroll corrections provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for payroll corrections, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this payroll corrections section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Appendix A: Pay Calendar

This reference section organizes the operational details associated with appendix a: pay calendar. The table or glossary should be read with the related body section because a row does not replace the surrounding eligibility, approval, or exception language.

The 2026 table contains 24 semi-monthly periods. The displayed dates apply the prior-weekday rule when the 15th or month end falls on a weekend; a holiday follows the same prior-business-day rule.

24	2026-12-16	2026-12-31	2026-12-31

The examples and explanatory wording in this appendix a: pay calendar section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the appendix a: pay calendar language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For appendix a: pay calendar, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of appendix a: pay calendar should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This appendix a: pay calendar provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for appendix a: pay calendar, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

Appendix B: Site-Specific Working Hours

This reference section organizes the operational details associated with appendix b: site-specific working hours. The table or glossary should be read with the related body section because a row does not replace the surrounding eligibility, approval, or exception language.

Seattle working hours are 09:00-17:00. Austin core hours are 09:00 to 16:00. Dublin working hours are 09:00-17:30.

Site	Working Hours / Core Hours
Seattle	09:00-17:00
Austin	Core hours 09:00 to 16:00
Dublin	09:00-17:30

Employees should provide accurate information for appendix b: site-specific working hours, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this appendix b: site-specific working hours section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the appendix b: site-specific working hours language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For appendix b: site-specific working hours, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of appendix b: site-specific working hours should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.

This appendix b: site-specific working hours provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Appendix C: Professional Certification Reimbursement Schedule

This reference section organizes the operational details associated with appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule. The table or glossary should be read with the related body section because a row does not replace the surrounding eligibility, approval, or exception language.

Professional certification reimbursement is capped at $1,200 per calendar year per employee.

This appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule provision is intended to be understandable without relying on a verbal shortcut. When a question involves more than one policy topic, the answer should cite each applicable section and explain how the provisions work together instead of selecting a rule merely because its wording appears to be the closest match.

Employees should provide accurate information for appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule, review the status shown in the designated system, and raise a discrepancy when the system record does not match the written policy. The responsible team should investigate the difference using the effective date, version, and document identifier shown on the first page.

The examples and explanatory wording in this appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule section clarify how the stated rule operates; they do not increase a cap, shorten a deadline, create a new payment, or remove an approval. Where the document contains a local-law footnote or a site-specific entry, that exception should be considered together with the general rule rather than read in isolation.

Managers and process owners should apply the appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule language consistently and preserve the record that supports the decision. Communications should identify the relevant document and section so that the employee can distinguish the written policy from an informal explanation, a draft, or a rule that applies only at another site.

For appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule, the policy separates the underlying entitlement or standard from the procedure used to administer it. Employees should first identify the rule that applies, then follow the stated request, approval, record, or escalation path. A similar word or number in another BluePeak document may describe a different program and should not be substituted for this section.

Administration of appendix c: professional certification reimbursement schedule should remain traceable from the employee question to the controlling policy text. The named owner may explain the provision and coordinate the relevant teams, but the explanation should preserve every stated threshold, eligibility condition, exception, and effective date contained in this document.
